

DAVIES, SOROBABEL (1806 - 1877), schoolmaster and Baptist minister

Name: Sorobabel Davies
Date of birth: 1806
Date of death: 1877
Gender: Male
Occupation: schoolmaster and Baptist minister
Area of activity: Education; Religion
Author: Thomas Richards

Born at Llety Shôn near Llandilo; went to the Academy at Bristol, and was ordained at Llandyfân (1825); then minister at Llandilo (1825-7) and Bwlch-y-gwynt (1836-9). Before this he had begun to keep school, especially at Fishguard (1833), where he was of particular service to the Baptist cause when the minister James Richards lost his voice for a time. Preaching and teaching ran together: he kept school at Llandilo, Cross Inn, Llanelly, Laugharne, and St Clears (twice). He was at St Clears when one of the officials of the education commission of 1846 came by, and a letter from Sorobabel is one of the most interesting entries in the notorious 'Blue Books' that were published in 1847. In it he gives an outline of his own career, expatiates on the methods of gathering pupils for the school, on the books brought by the pupils, on the deep poverty of the countryside, on the readiness of the common people to give schooling to their children if they had the means. The school was held in a sometime Unitarian chapel, with an earthen floor; but the master made an excellent impression upon the sub-commissioner, with his placid leisurely manner, his discipline, and easy control of the pupils. In 1852 he migrated to Australia, and became schoolmaster under the State; he kept on preaching, and it is open to debate whether it was he or W. M. Evans, the Methodist, who preached the first Welsh sermon in Australia. He became a newspaper proprietor and editor of the Pleasant Creek News (that was the name of the district he settled in, 150 miles from Melbourne). He invested money in the gold ventures, and these turned out so fortunately for him that he died in prosperous circumstances in May 1877.
